- Surge of Millennials purchasing first home
- Boomers making life-style changes
- Work-from-home phenomenon means buyers have more flexibility to live where they want, not where they work
- Nesting instinct drives desire for more square footage, more choice, more usable designs with home offices, multi-generational living & areas for study
- Lower unemployment rates among college graduates
- Relocation from high-density urban environment to suburbs & migrating across the U.S. to lower-cost high-growth markets
- Some affordability issues neutralized with migration from high priced coastal markets (CA & Northeast) to lower priced, more affordable markets (NV, AZ, ID, TX, FL, NC, GA)
- High demand in high-barrier-to-entry markets

EVOLUTION OF THE HOMEBUILDING INDUSTRY

WHY IS HOMEBUILDING A BETTER BUSINESS THAN IN THE PAST? WHAT HAS CHANGED?

- Largest players are taking share – Public homebuilders have gone from 27% market share in 2012 to about 51% today
 - Better access to capital – Small private builders struggle to finance their existing volume of business
 - Better access to labor – Larger builders provide more consistent work for trades
 - Higher bargaining power with suppliers – Volume and consistency of work allows for better bids from trades and material suppliers
 - Less competition – Small private builders are Toll's main competition in the luxury niche and face the greatest pressures
- Balance Sheet Management – Greater Use of Land Options
 - Makes companies safer – Optionality provides additional flexibility
 - Drives Higher ROE business – Asset light operating model
 - Less cyclical industry – Investing counter cyclically results in less “boom and bust” and more “sustainable growth”
- Demand for Quick Move-In (Spec) Favors Scale Players – Capital needed to start homes without a buyer favors the largest public homebuilders
 - Public builders are acting like manufacturing companies with consistent production and ability to scale to meet growth
